

A close-up photograph showing two vertical metal pipes connected by a coupling nut. The coupling nut is a hexagonal metal piece with a central threaded hole. It is secured to the pipes using two large, flat metal washers and two long bolts. The bolts pass through the washers and the coupling nut, with the ends of the bolts protruding from the sides. The metal surfaces appear slightly weathered or painted.

